All of these articles emphasize the centrality of the biblical text and the relative flexibility in interpretative methods in the Classical and Medieval periods: when there was doubt or confusion, interpreters changed, re-contextualized, and/or supplemented the biblical text, often quite radically. The second section, called "Biblical Interpretation, Judaism and Christianity," includes three disparate essays.

He concludes that, despite the fact that some non-Jewish scholars show Tendenzen that are typically seen in Jewish scholarship, some remarkable traits of Jewish biblical interpretation, now as in the past, are predilections toward "polemics, parshanut, pluriformity, and the priority of "R." The latter is not explained in the paper as well as I would have expected it, but as I understand it, it stands for the biblical redactor (as opposed to source criticism), as well as for the ...

"Pardes" refers to approaches to biblical exegesis in rabbinic Judaism or to interpretation of text in Torah study. The term, sometimes also rendered PaRDeS, is an acronym formed from the initials of the following four approaches: Peshat – "surface" or the literal meaning. Remez – "hints" or the deep meaning beyond just the literal sense. Derash – from Hebrew darash: "inquire" – the comparative meaning, as given through similar occurrences. Sod – "secret" or the esoteric/mystical ...

BIBLICAL EXEGESIS: JEWISH VIEWS. The shift from rabbinic hermeneutics to medieval exegesis is marked by discrimination between different types of interpretation. It has been suggested, though not established, that this occurred, in the Arabic-speaking world, under the impetus of Karaism which, by rejecting the authority of rabbinic tradition, forced proponents and opponents alike to consider the literal meaning of the biblical text.

Over the centuries, Jewish and Christian scholars have developed different ways of interpreting the Bible. Jewish rabbis living around the time of Jesus developed an elaborate set of rules to help them interpret their sacred texts. Among early Christian writers, there were two main schools of thought about biblical interpretation.
