Abstract. Natural products have a long history in drug discovery, with their inherent biological activity often tailored by medicinal chemists to arrive at the final drug product. This process is illustrated by numerous examples, including the conversion of epothilone to ixabepilone, erythromycin to azithromycin, and lovastatin to simvastatin.

Covering: 2000 to 2020. Machine learning (ML) is an efficient tool for the prediction of bioactivity and the study of structure-activity relationships. Over the past decade, an emerging trend for combining these approaches with the study of natural products (NPs) has developed in order to manage the challenge of the discovery of bioactive NPs. In the present review, we will introduce the basic principles and protocols for using the ML approach to investigate the bioactivity of NPs, citing ...

Biological Activity. This class of natural products initially attracted interest in the area of antimicrobial/anticoccidial biological activity, since most members showed strong activity towards Gram-positive bacteria including methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus and vancomycin-resistant Enterococcus faecalis. 3,8,18 For example, simaomicin (10), was found to be one of the most potent non-synthetic broad spectrum anticoccidial agents ever reported, requiring just 1 ppm in ...
